Hardi Anam uses fabric manipulation techniques to produce clothing out of textile waste. When she was studying her bachelor of science in fashion design, she became familiar with various construction methods. Since then, she has been highly interested in fabric manipulation techniques.

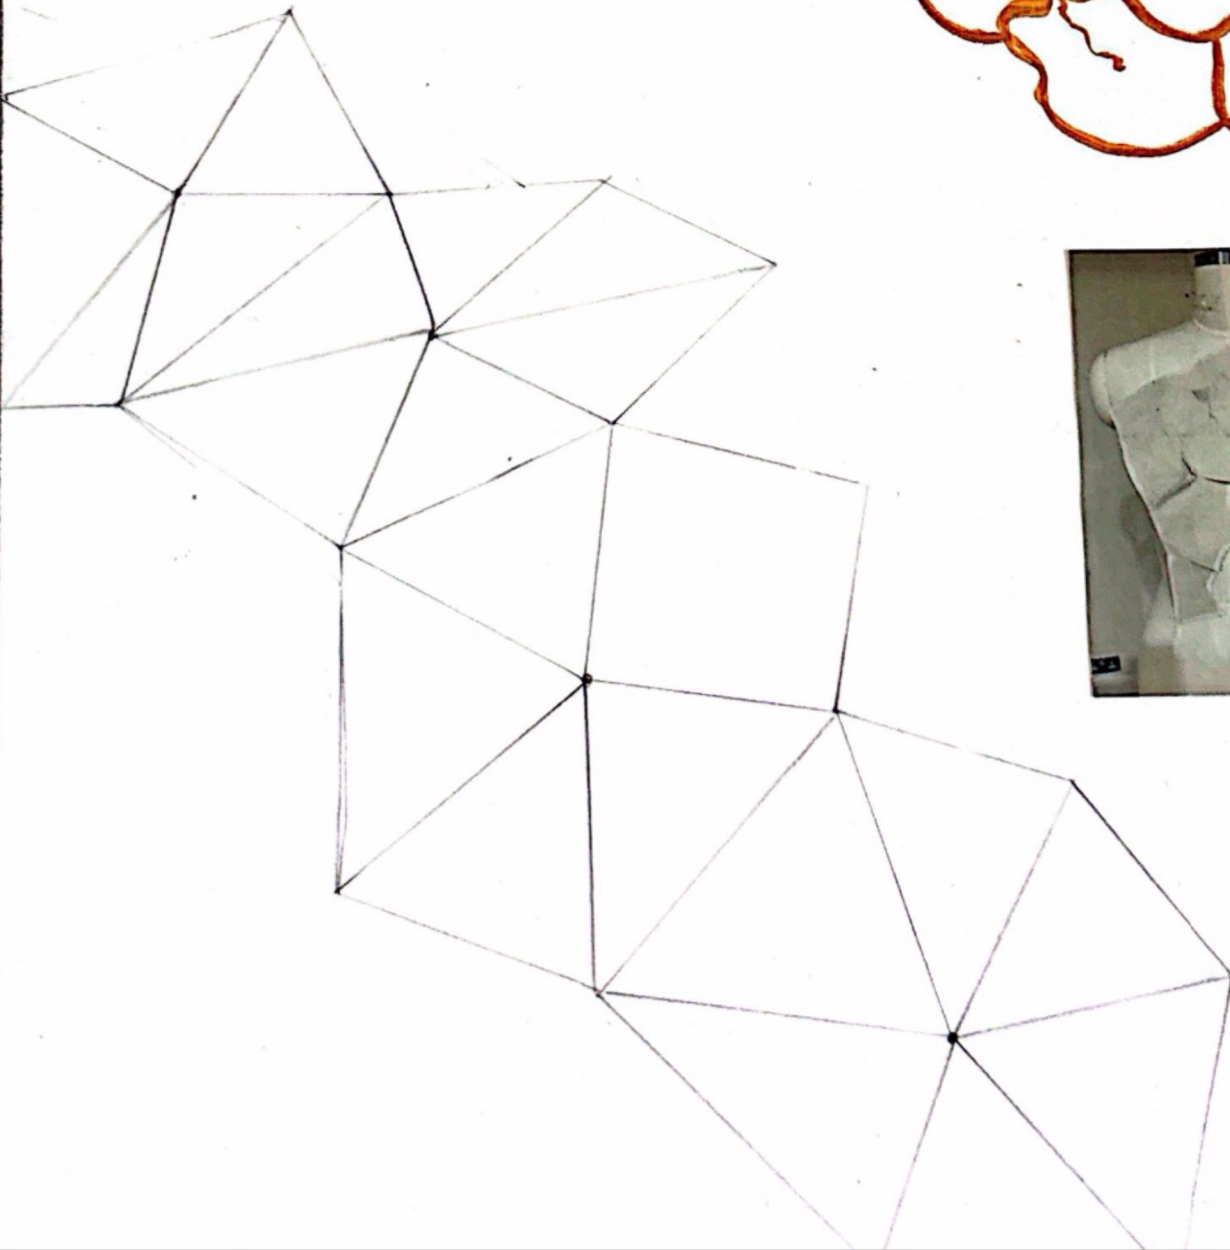

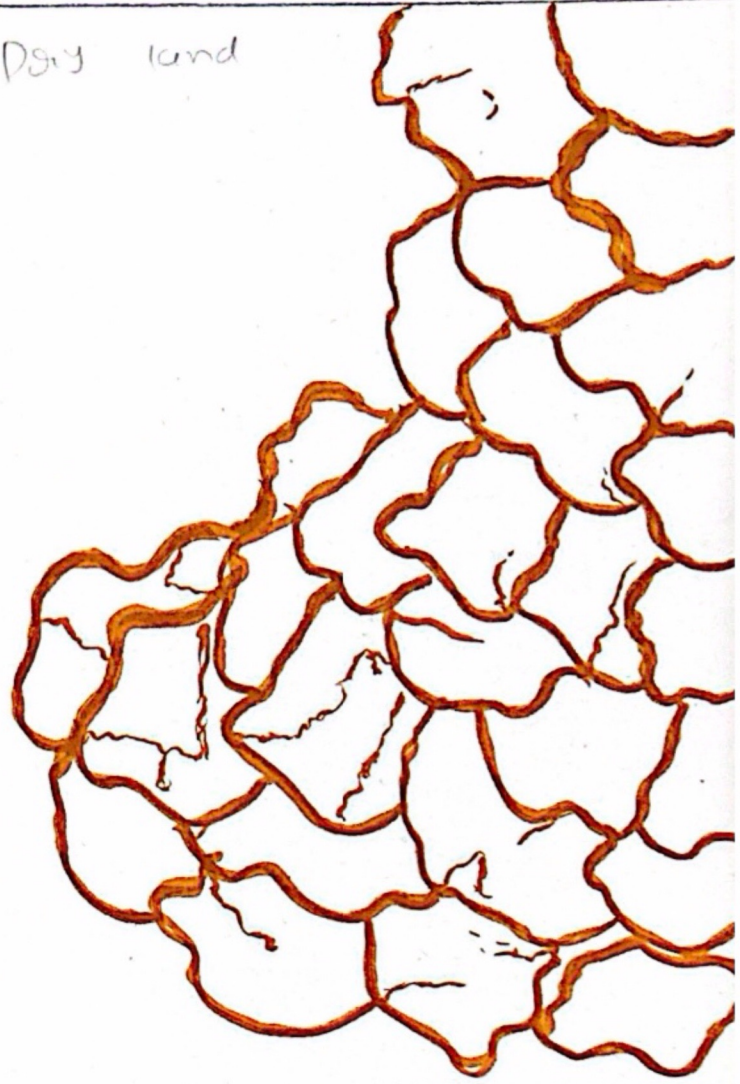

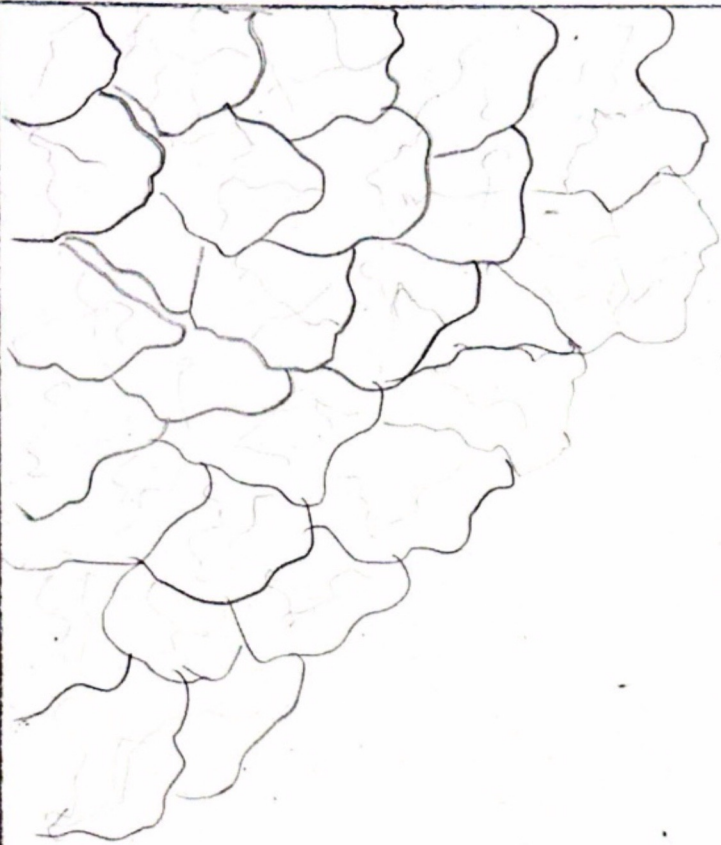

When she started studying Textile design at the university for the creative arts, she learned about sustainability and conducted study on textile waste, how it is dangerous to our planet. She resolved to act in reaction to the situation. That is how she came up with the idea of combining her interest and textile waste. At this point, she began designing garments using scrap textiles and fabric manipulation techniques.

She picked nature as her source of inspiration for working toward sustainability. She began by gathering textile scraps to give structure to her ideas. Here her garment represents elements of nature such as earth, water, and air, which are affected by textile waste. She uses a color palette of landfill, water, and air for the clothing.
